AUTOMANIA

Alright Wally, deep breath, try not to turn this into one of your legendary catastrophes. All you've got to do is fetch the car parts, take 'em to the assembly area, and stick 'em together in the right order. It's not advanced engineering, it's barely even thinking — which means you might just scrape through without setting something on fire.

And honestly, if you'd invested in proper shelving instead of those Poundshop planks, half the workshop wouldn't be collapsing on your head every five minutes. The gangplanks only wobble because you bounce along them with all the finesse of an inebriated elephant, and if you ever, even once, put things back where they belong, you wouldn't have to hop around like a clown in those klompy ol' boots of yours!

You've got a whole fleet of cars to build, six parts each, and every single one is waiting on you. Start in the store, dodge the bouncing tyres before they take your lugs out from under you, climb the ladders without falling off, grab the bits, jump the gaps, avoid the junk piles — all the usual hazards you somehow manage to make look ten times harder than they are. Then bring everything back to the assembly area and drop each part in the right place. For the top pieces you'll even have to jump. Yes, Wally — jump. Preferably upwards, not sideways into a wall.

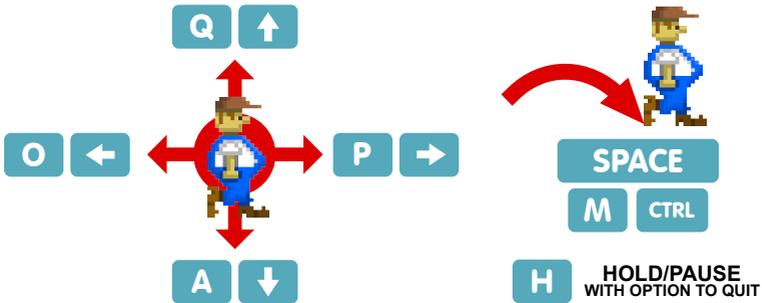

And listen carefully: don't even think about coming to me for your wages until the whole lot's finished, polished, and not missing any wheels.
